MANHATTAN MOVIE TOUR

Overview

Film production in New York City began in the 1940s with a film called the "The Naked City". Films were mostly made in Hollywood and London at the time, and occasionally went on location to places like Las Vegas and Paris, though primarily to take advantage of Las Vegas hotel deals or stay at a nice Paris hotel.

But by the 1950s many more films were being made in New York City. In 1954, a New York production "On the Waterfront" won eight Oscars, including Best Actor for a young Marlon Brando, and Best Picture, at the Academy Awards. In 1955, "Marty" also won Best Picture and three other Oscars.

Since then hundreds of films and television shows have been filmed in the streets of New York City. But in fact, not all of them have been true to their word with clever special effects, library footage and even other cities playing the part of New York have been used to keep film budgets low.

About the neighborhood: Soho

In the early 19th century, SoHo was an area of some farms, rolling hills, streams and even a swamp at its southern end. By mid-19th century these were replaced by more solid structures of masonry and cast iron. It was a lively theatre and shopping district, and many brothels. Eventually, as the center of the growing city continued to move uptown, the quality of the area declined, until it became known as Hell's Hundred Acres, an industrial wasteland, full of sweatshops and small factories in the daytime, but empty at night.

In the mid-20th century, artists began to move in to have large spaces in which they could both live and work, in what were called loft spaces. In 1968 artists and activists were forming an organization to legalize their living in a manufacturing zone. The area, South of Houston, Houston being Houston Street, was shortened to SoHo when the group voted to call itself the SoHo Artists Association, and the name for the neighborhood stuck.

The name SoHo is the model for other new neighborhood acronyms in New York City, such as NoHo, for NOrth of HOuston Street, TriBeCa (TRIangle BElow CAnal Street), Nolita (NOrth of Little ITaly), and DUMBO (Down Under the Manhattan Bridge Overpass).
